Upstream River Crossings
Ferries and bridges across the South Yuba River were established in the 1850s at Jones' Bar (Rush Creek Ferry, 1851), Hoit's Crossing (1856), Purdon Crossing (Lower Robinson, 1853), Cooper's Crossing (Illinois Bar, 1855), and Edward's Crossing (Upper Robinson, 1855). The concrete arch bridge at Highway 49 Crossing was built in 1921 and replaced by the modern bridge just upstream. These sites form the upstream parcels of South Yuba River State Park.

1851
TO THE PUBLIC
Notice is hereby given to packers and miners that the Rush Creek Ferry is still in “full float” and the only way of crossing the South Yuba River between Washington and Bridgeport. Persons will therefore save themselves by bearing it in mind. Jones and Armour (Nevada Journal, December 26, 1851, page 3, column 1).

1853
April 15, an advertisement in the newspaper:
RUSH CREEK FERRY
NOTICE
We notify the public and the traveling community in general, that the well-known ferry, which is sometimes known as “Sweetland’s or Jones Crossing” on the South Yuba, first ferry above Bridgeport is in full operation and can cross animals with little or no danger. Having the largest boat on the river, with good new cable and tackle, and two experienced ferrymen, who have been in constant attendance for two years, and witnessed all stages of the river. Would recommend to the public, for their personal safety, to cross at the above ferry. There is a good road cut on both sides of the river, for easy access on both sides. (Kimbol and Hanson, Nevada Journal, April 15, 1853; pg. 3)

Highway 49 Crossing

The rising popularity of the automobile in the 1920’s created a need for new roads and bridges. The State of California began building this rainbow-arch style concrete bridge in October 1921 and completed it in early 1922. Prior to this time, traffic to North San Juan or Downieville crossed the river at the existing Purdon’s Crossing Bridge about five miles upstream, or at the Jones Bar Bridge, which was dismantled in 1918, one mile downstream. In 1993, the California Department of Transportation built the present Highway 49 Bridge. The old bridge continues to service pedestrian traffic.
